PSYCHOSEXUAL THERAPY

with Dr Gillian Vanhegen

Live Event:

Summary

This discussion explored aspects of communication related to psychosexual problems. Non-verbal cues and warnings were considered, as well as appropriate responses to a patient revealing sensitive information of this nature. The need to adapt one's communication to suit the situation and the patient was explained.

The importance of observing boundaries was recognised, together with the need to remain conscious of the limits of one's expertise, referring to more qualified practitioners where necessary.

Accurate note-taking was emphasised, as this is an aspect of practice which could easily lead to misunderstandings and, potentially, complaints. The role of the chaperone was also covered, and training opportunities for both practitioner and chaperone discussed.

This was an important reminder that patients might have underlying emotional problems of a very sensitive nature, and the guidance on how to handle situations where these are made known in clinic was as very helpful. It will contribute to my providing better advice to patients, and by helping them access appropriate psychotherapy will improve the results of my treatment for MSK problems.
